The Dutton government was accused on Wednesday of making the decision to grant citizenship to a Syrian child even though the refugee could have been a victim of Islamic State. But Immigration Minister Peter Dutton said the cabinet took the decision following a cabinet meeting to decide a national security case under his portfolio. The comments came after The Courier-Mail revealed the government granted citizenship to seven-year-old Om Aamer in August after the family's lawyer provided documentary evidence of his mother's role in Isis. Opposition immigration spokesman Scott Morrison slammed the decision, saying the government had failed to follow proper procedures and the process was not in keeping with the Australian way. "This government is fundamentally betraying the Australian people's hopes that we are a nation of law," Mr Morrison said in Sydney. "This is not how the Australian process works and it is not how our Australian laws work." The Courier-Mail revealed in August that 82157476af
