Try a fast access from our database. In the table header click on the "Show" and then on "Products". The table should now be sorted by "Name" and "Country". By clicking on the links, you will access the following pages: Interesting. Below is the link to the rpayville page. It looks like rpayville uses a "Google Places" page. I was able to get a street address and when I did a reverse lookup on the number for the page in question it came up with the results I saw in the rpayville database. I was able to do a reverse look up using geocode.com and got the same results. The links on the page are interesting. It looks like the boxes around the images could be used for links. It does look like the rpayville site was created for the purpose of selling products. Why should the industry be paying for this data? What we need is a free database so that members of the public can search and find out what serial numbers are already in use and the sites that use them. If manufacturers know this then they are not really interested in paying for a database. So what we need is a database of serial number locations with links to site or manufacturer pages that can be used as a reference for resellers who sell these things. Hi jayman, you are exactly right, but the RIAA did not tell the truth to the FCC in 1992, "We are not going to listen to records on the radio.", in fact they never did. So now they are going into an arena where they cannot tell the truth. "We have no need to pay for a database because we already have it.". They are trying to milk the public. Yesterday, a producer who works for the RIAA told me that the industry is calling on the FCC to have all amateur radio operators register under the recording act. But this is a lie. The only thing the FCC will do is to have the feds come into our hobby and take a look at who is operating. The RIAA knows that there is no way that they can get enough records of all amateur radio stations for the FCC to take any action against us. What we need is for the recording industry to get out of the way, and let the hobby grow as it should, with only a select few regulations. I do not know of any records of any 82157476af
